MATE

Mate is a beverage made with dried and ground leaves of "caa" and hot water, sipped through a pump. Caa (fr. Guarani ka'a, "wood", "herb") is a So. American holly (Illex paraguayensis), which grows on the marshy plains of the Paraná-Paraguay basin. It resembles the orange tree in color and shape of leaves, but it is ordinarily higher (up to 20 m).

The Guarani Indians used to chew caa leaves and drink its infusions when the Spanish arrived in Paraguay in 1537. Later the Jesuit priests adopted the use of mate and introduced a metal (usu. silver) "bombilla" (little pump) to sip it. For this reason, mate is also called "Jesuit tea" or "Paraguyan tea". The Jesuits cultivated caa in their missions or "reductions" and were great producers of "yerba mate", i.e., caa leaves prepared for mate.

Mate is sipped from a piece of the gourd shell, which is ordinarily artistically engraved for that purpose. This vessel was called "mati" in Quechuan, the language of the Incaic Empire.

Pure mate or "cimarrón" (chimarrão, in Portuguese) is bitter and hot, because it is prepared with heated (not boiling) water. It is a stimulant tonic for the nerves, brain, stomach, and muscles. It affords vitality and endurance against tiredness. It also can be sweetened with sugar or honey, or mixed to officinal plants like lemon balm (Melissa officinalis), boldutree (Peumus boldus), baccharis (Baccharis articulata), golden-trumpet (Anemopaegma mirandum) etc.

Mate is a very popular beverage in Paraguay, Argentina, Uruguay and South Brasil, where it easily beat wine and soft drinks.

Mate is usually served collectively, i. e., several people sip mate from the same vessel alternatively. For this reason psychologists say mate is a good form of group therapy.
